Boomerang: Housewife's Love Potion Sends Her To Early Grave

— Apr 22, 2015 12:44 pm | 0 Comments

An attempt by a frustrated housewife in Atumaga Community in Delta State to get her husband to fulfill his conjugal duties by her at the weekend backfired after she reportedly ate an egusi (melon) soup laced with a poisonous charm she procured from a native doctor.

Reports said the housewife identified as Egwoli (surname withheld) had complained of abandonment -that her husband has not been making love to her since they got married two years ago.

But sources said the housewife, a petty trader, instead of seeking the family's intervention, allegedly sought the help of native doctor who prepared a charm via egusi soup for thee man to have a charge of heart.

It was reliably gathered that the man had been sleeping with other women outside his home after he complained of an odour from his wife.

On her return from the native doctor's place on Friday evening, as she immediately applied the charm but unfortunately the man was nowhere to be found. She was said to have mistakenly mixed the charm in her own soup not knowing it was poisonous. She ate it, went to bed and died.

Speaking to our correspondent, the police PRO in Delta State, DSP Celestina Kalu, said the police were currently investigating the circumstances that led to the woman's death, adding that reports indicated she was involved in fetish activities.

But the husband, who did not want his name in the print, said: "My wife had threatened to make me impotent when I stopped making love to her for obvious reasons and I found some fetish items in her room, including the egusi soup she ate before her death."
