A 200 Level student of Business Studies of Lead City University, Michael Olusola Oluyemi has been allegedly found dead in the swimming pool located in the university.

His body was recovered from the pool barely two days after he left his private residence for an ATM centre in town and disappeared without a trace.

The 26-year-old deceased, according to sources had returned home on Thursday November 2, 2017, and told his neighbours he was going to visit an ATM centre to withdraw some money around 5 pm.

Oluyemi however did not return home several hours later, which prompted his neighbours to call his mobile phone. The calls were however not answered.

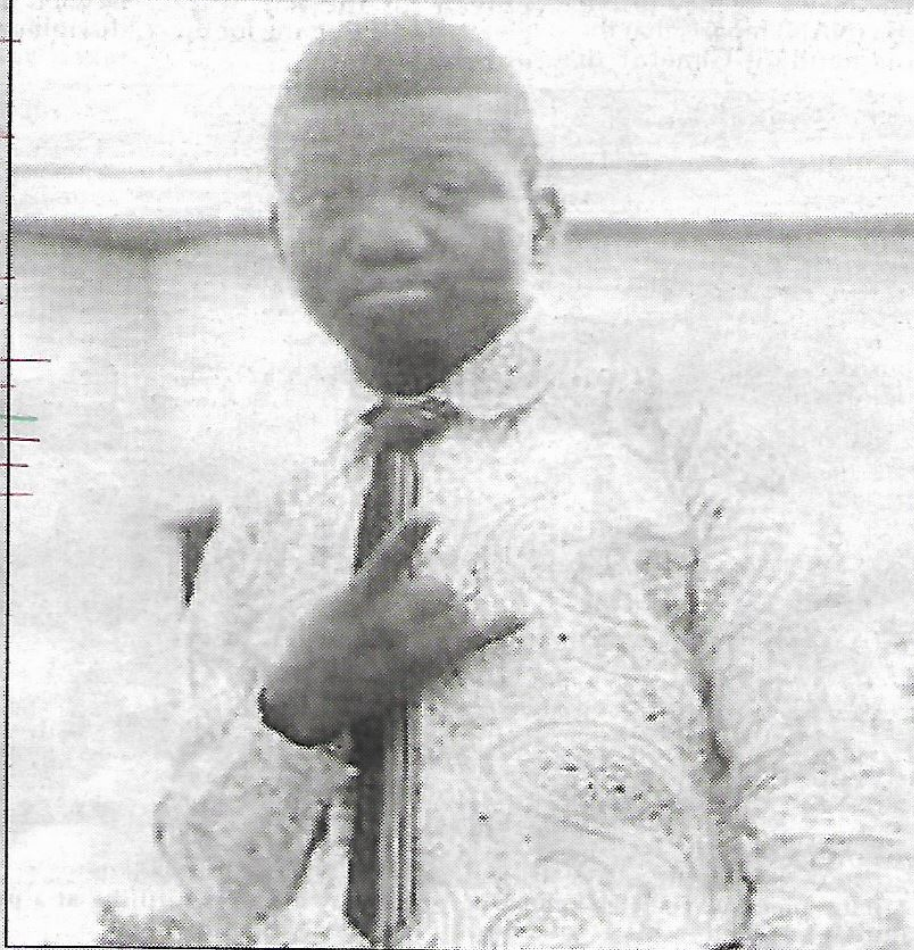

The Nation learnt that a search party organised for him did not also yield fruit.

Our correspondent learnt that Oluyemi's death had sparked a row with his family members accusing the school of complicity in his controversial death.

A member of the family who asked not to be named said there was more to Oluyemi's death than meet the eyes.

He wondered why Oluyemi who returned home from the school and left a few hours later for an ATM centre, was found dead in the pool located in the university.

"We found it difficult to agree that Oluyemi went to the pool to swim and died there as the univer-

"The university's swimming pool is being manned by more than two security men because it is a restricted area. How come he was not sent back by the security men, if it is true that he went there to swim?

Recalling how the news of Oluyemi's death was broken to the family, the source said: " Oluyemi lives off-campus; he rented an apartment in the Powerline area of Sanyo, Ibadan. On Thursday No-
