A resident of Niger Area in the metropolis, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said that Indomie died after the bullet he fired at the night guards, hit him back 'mysteriously.'

"We were told that he was coming from somewhere late in the night and was sighted by night-guards, who challenged him to know where he was coming from by that time.

"In the process, an argument ensued and Indomie brought out a gun and shot at the night-guards but unknown to him, the bullet returned and hit him in the chest. He died instantly at the scene.

"He was a member of a notorious cult group and had been wreaking havoc in our community. We have tried in the past to put him behind the bars. But to our surprise, after his arrest and arraignment in court, he would resurface again, that had always been the case here.

"His appearance in the community usually created fear in the people. Though, it is not like we are happy that he finally met his waterloo, people would be, at least, relieved of the fear of the unknown," he said.

The Police Public Relations Officer in the state, Ajayi Okasanmi, a Deputy Superintendent of Police, who confirmed the death of the suspected cultist, said that investigations had commenced into the incident.
