Residents of Chibok, a Borno community where over 200 schoolgirls were abducted on April 14, have been visited with fresh pains as Boko Haram invaded the town, shooting sporadically.

Boko Haram stormed the community on Thursday evening, shooting indiscriminately, a fleeing resident told Saturday Sun on phone. He said the insurgents rode into the town in a convoy of about three hilux vehicles barely an hour after military troops left.

"We started hearing gunshots and shout of Allah Akbar (Allah is great) as soon as they entered the town. Everybody fled in different direction upon hearing gunshots," Maina Chibok disclosed. He said the insurgents also burnt down some houses.

Chibok, located south of Borno sadly gained international attention following the abduction of over 200 schoolgirls from their dormitory on April 14, necessitating national and international outrage.

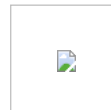

The attack on Chibok came as the insurgents killed 16 people in Gwoza which it declared its territory since September. "Many of the residents who fled to the Mandara mountains, were again pursued by the insurgents on Thursday. Sixteen people have been killed," a very reliable source who has been in contact with fleeing residents in the area told Saturday Sun yesterday.

The source said Boko Haram has been killing fleeing villagers around the mountain "almost on daily basis" but unreported due to lack of communication facility and the security situation in the area.

Gwoza is currently under Boko Haram control. Other local governments controlled by Boko Haram include:

Bama, Dikwa, Marte, Mafa, Abadam, Gamboru/ Ngala in Borno, Gujba and Gulani, Michika and Madagali in
