ENUGU A yet-to-be-identified lady, suspected to be a student of Peaceland University Enugu, was crushed to death, while two others were hospitalised, when final year students of the Institute of Management and Technology, IMT, Enugu, celebrating their final examinations, lost control of their car and veered into a crowd of students.

The victim was said to have come to IMT, to celebrate her friends who wrote their final year examinations when the incident happened on Monday.

A student, who did not want his name mentioned in the report, said one of the graduating students, in a celebratory mood, was driving recklessly before the car plowed into a crowd of students.

He said the car, which appeared to have had a brake failure, hit some students before running over the victim.

A video clip recorded after the accident showed some students lifting the car while the body of the unidentified victim was seen underneath.

In a circular on Tuesday, the Acting Rector of the IMT, Emeka Ejim, said he had repeatedly warned students of the institution against "riotous and excessive celebration.

"The girl that died is not an IMT student, but (she is of) Peaceland. She came to sign off one of the injured students," Ejim said.

Peaceland is a private university located a few miles away from the IMT.

He said the injured students were receiving treatment at Posh Hospital in the New Haven Area of Enugu.

Ejim said one of the injured students is an HND I student while the second victim is an HND II - all from the public administration department of the institution.

Ndigbo in Ghana calls for convergence of tradition, achievement

THE traditional ruler of the Igbo Community in Ghana and Leader of the Adoteimah Kinadom. Dr. Iawe Raymond leadership in Ghana and innovative businesses led by members of the diaspora.

According to Okadigbo, "The concept of Igbo kings in diaspora reflects a powerful tradition where prominent Igbo leaders are appointed to uphold cultural, social, and political values for Igbo people living outside Nigeria.

Okadigbo said: "Do not forget your roots. The Igbo worldwide should never lose sight of their heritage."

He emphasized the importance of promoting Igbo culture and values. He encouraged Igbo diasporans, particularly traders to remain connected to their roots, no matter how successful they become, stating: "Your comfort zone is not your final destination. Nothing good comes from your comfort zone. Always remember your home, and invest in its development."
