The latest killing of Joy Adeyemi of the Department of Human Kinetics of the institution, sparked off students' protest in Akungba, the university community.

Recall that two undergraduates of the institution, Andrei Okah of the Department of History and International Studies and John Abba of the Department of Economics were abducted and killed.

The suspected killers were later arrested by police detectives but the prime suspect, who was the landlord of John Abba, later died mysteriously in the police custody.

On the latest incident, a source told Vanguard that the victim was murdered on Tuesday by her boyfriend, who fled the community.

According to the source, "The alleged killer is said to be an indigene of the town. "The deceased was killed by her boyfriend on Tuesday and locked her inside his room. It was neighbours that that raised the alarm to call attention of the students when they perceived bad odour from the room.

"We are yet to know the reason the guy killed that lady. The lady operates POS in that area, but since Tuesday, she had disappeared and nobody knew her whereabouts until yesterday, when the neighbors were perceiving a bad smell, from her room.

"They boy, after killing her, went away with the money she used for her POS business.

“It is high time the state government did something about the killings of our students by the indigenes of this town. If nothing is done, this may lead to a serious crisis in this community.
